Millets (ragi and non-ragi) such as Finger millet, little millet and sorghum are traditionally grown in rainfed, tribal, and resource-poor regions of Odisha and play a crucial role in ensuring household food and nutritional security. However, one of the major constraints in the expansion and sustained cultivation of millets (ragi and non-ragi) is the limited availability of quality seeds at the farmer level. In the absence of an organized and decentralized seed production system, farmers often depend on informal seed sources, resulting in poor varietal purity, low seed replacement rates, and sub-optimal productivity. To address these gaps, the Seed Production programme for ragi and non-ragi millets under the SAA is conceptualized with a focus on strengthening local seed systems through participatory approaches involving farmers and researchers.

Ragi and Non-Ragi millet seed production activities are focused to be carried out across selected districts and blocks, involving progressive farmers, local researchers, and institutional support. Participatory seed production, varietal maintenance, and localized multiplication to ensure timely availability of quality mother seeds and improved planting material for subsequent seasons, is prioritized.
